

To-day's despatches from Constantinople report still further outbreaks in Asiatic Turkey, Turks rather than Armenians being this time the victims. This may be only the natural result of the fact that this time it is the Turks who tell the story. But all despatches from that quarter of the world have one significance, and that is that the Turkish rule is unfit to outlive a civilized century, and that the time has come when enlightened Europe must make an end of it for humanity's sake and set up something better in its stead.
